Mrs. Mary Hallock Foote in her new novel, "The Royal Americans," to be published this month, has undertaken a most difficult problem of character development under very unusual conditions. Her heroine is a young white girl who has lived as a captive in an Indian tribe since infancy and is resound by an English fiver at the age of 13 and an English the same age. This young appears to be that Rogers was drawn, executed and quartered for arding the escape of a Jesuit priest. The execution is further of a Jesuit priest. Her love affairs with young men whose primitive impulses have been ourbed by a careful education, the change which comes over her under the influence managed with [skill and delicacy which will be of special interest to lovers of a logically developed and carefully rendered character study.

"The Ramrodders," Holman Day's forthcoming story, is a political buttle over prohibition. A young lumberman goes to the city where the Legislature meets and looks on at the political game in all its phases from the drawing room of the leader to the back room of hotels.
